

The degree to which a test, owing to its technical properties and accuracy, can be used to make a diagnosis; the usefulness of a test is also expressed in terms of its influence on the choice of treatment and on the health of an individual or a population.