

A method of estimating the cost of the production loss resulting from the absence of an employee during the period needed by the organization to replace the employee and return to the initial level of productivity.