

A research design in which the subjects or groups of subjects are matched (on the basis of prognostic factors, for example) and one member of each pair is allocated to the experimental group and the other to the control group.