

A trial that compares two contemporaneous groups, one receiving the treatment of interest, the other being the control group (in a randomised clinical trial, for example).

Note: Some of these trials have more than one treatment group; others compare two treatment groups, each being a control for the other.